It has a mantle, tentacles and arms covered with numerous suckers that help the animals to move along the sea floor. The word squid is derived from a Spanish word that means "sea egg", from the Latin word squilla. It may also be referred to as octopuses, cuttlefish, chambered nautilus, or sea butterfly. The scientific name of the squid is Haliphora Spinifera. A squid can be anything from a short-range migratory species, living as far as 80 meters from its hatchling stage, to a long-range, pelagic migratory species that lives for years. They can be found in warm oceans around the world, such as in the Indo-Pacific, Red Sea, Caribbean Sea, Mediterranean Sea, the Gulf of Mexico, and in the Gulf of California. Some squid are very large, while others are tiny. Some live near the sea floor, while others can be found at great depths in the water column. Physiology Squid and cuttlefish A squid or cuttlefish is a cephalopod and one of the two subclasses of the class Cephalopoda. They have a centralized nervous system with a brain, a broad heart, and four to six pairs of tentacles. In the cuttlebone, a form of cuticle, each tentacle is independently movable. Squid and cuttlefish are closely related, and constitute the order Sepioidea, which includes the cuttlefish and squid. They have a characteristic form, f988f36e3a
